Chapter 5: Those that came before

We waited for some hours until all had returned. Why? Because the dwarf and the barbarian decided to destroy all orc corpses. Why not just let some plants take care of it?

Watch with the oriental woman, and then somebody came to visit. No need to raise the alarm. She was at home in woods and hills, on grass and rock. We talked, I'm not sure about what, but we had a lot in common. She could help me, she told me, if I would listen to her voice in trees, animals, and the change of seasons. She worried more than the Lord of Trees, but her care was somehow heartwarming. I agreed and she moved on again. Of course the dwarf wanted to know what was going on and he acted proper for a whole day before returning to his 'this is against some rule' position. Oh, and now I know why I dislike going underground: the barbarian got ill. I also learned why the eastern woman feels familiar: she's been touched by the Fey Court. At least one other person in this group who has a feeling for nature.

We could not move camp, so they wanted to check out those cave. Foolishly I decided to come along. The walls, the darkness, the smell, it overwhelmed me. Felina helped me. Why am I here?

Next day, barbarian Cuura still ill (though mending) and dwarf Grimwald found a secret corridor. No plants, a buried dwarven hero, undead vermin, and Reed showing use of exchange magic. No more dungeons for me!
